Women in Tanzania and the world over, have always been very active in contributing to National development. This contribution, however has neither been recognized nor acknowledged by society especially the decision makers who have always been mostly men.

In Tanzania, for example, during colonial era, many men moved to sisal and Tobacco plantations to provide the needed labour force. Women were left home to care for children and parents. During the struggle for independence in the 1950's women did a lot in campaigning but during elections were rarely voted into parliamentary seats. On the issue of education, parents and the community at large preferred to educate boys more than they did for girls.

Girls were expected to bring dowry for their parents once they had reached puberty. At family level, decision making was done by the father and the rest of the members were just obeying.

After independence things changed a bit where more girls had access to school. However, subjects remained the same, gender stereotyped ones. As a result of lack of education their roles were ignored as a result they are having less access to employment opportunities and choices as well as lack of decision making within and outside their homes. Decision making on issues like reproductive health, family size and child spacing are not within their power.

The main cause of this discrimination of women is the wrong belief and customs through informal education which are to be eradicated soon by those who value women contribution to development. Stakeholders on issues related to women development in collaboration with leaders should sensitize and educate the people about equality. Women need to be empowered through education and training, health, employment and providing them with financial support (loans) for small business. Cultural practices which do not favour women should be removed. "To educate a woman is to educate the entire Nation".
